Demand For American-Made Supplements Grows

(NAPSA)—More and more Americans are using nutritional supplements, to both treat specific problems and to support overall health. But recent concerns regarding the safety of some foreign-made supplements have led many cautious shoppers to look twice at product labels—specifically, to find the country of origin.

Increasing numbers of Americans are seeking out purely U.S.-made supplements to ensure that their products are pure and deliver what is stated on the bottle label. After the recent scare with tainted pet foods, toys and other Chinese-manufactured products, it has never been more evident that inferior quality can compromise personal safety and possibly impact on your overall health. As a direct result, consumers are starting to read labels more carefully to make sure that nutritional products and their ingredients are made exclusively in America.

Fortunately, there are options, including nutritional supplements that are made in America and that utilize only the finest-quality, American-made ingredients. For example, millions of Americans depend on the supplementation of their normal diets with glucosamine alone and in combination with chondroitin sulfate to help improve their bone and joint health.

In light of the recent controversy over foreign supplements, a company called NutraSense has seen increased sales of its glu-cosamine/chondroitin products for people and pets.

“We not only produce 100 percent American-made specialty supplements for human consumption,” explains Robin Harding, director of marketing for NutraSense Inc., “but we also have a proprietary line of products for pets as well. All of our products at NutraSense are top quality and GMP (Good Manufacturing Practices) compliant.”

NutraSense provides an array of U.S.-manufactured specialty nutritional supplements that help with joint health, sports nutrition, weight management and immune support. In addition, the company offers quality food-based vitamins and minerals for the whole family, as well as an especially unique line of pet products.
