Personal Video Phones—I Just Called To See You Smile

(NAPSA)—The methods of getting messages from one person to another over distance have changed a lot from the days of smoke signals, telegraphs and telephones. Even in the recent past, things have changed in the way people communicate and that includes e-mail, Web cams, video conferencing, the picture phone and cell phones.

The latest wave in communication is the personal video phone. It allows you to see the person you are talking to, so you'll never miss a thing. This may account for the growing popularity of video phones as gifts. Giving one to family and friends will allow you to see them opening those gifts at Christmas or birthdays. A personal video phone also means you won't miss those first steps or everyday moments when you're far away from a loved one.

The video phone you'll see most in homes where people like to see the person they're talking to is the Ojo. Pronounced OH-joe, the phones were created by WorldGate, a leader in personal telephony. One of the things people like about the Ojo is the great picture quality and the fact that the large color screen and video camera is at eye level, for a natural viewing angle.

It's For You—video phones that allow you to talk face-to-face with friends and family. Many say it's just like being there.

Key to Ojo's performance is a full, smooth, video without any jerkiness or time delays.

The video phone is easy to use, install and set up, and it can communicate with any other Ojo anywhere in the world.

For those who like to give unusual gifts, video telephony has arrived. To learn more, visit www.ojophone.com.
