Touch-Up Paint For Your Car Easier To Find

(NAPSA)—Apparently motorists have only scratched the surface when it comes to finding the exact color of touch-up paint to cover that new scratch on their vehicles. It's not easy. Some automotive paint experts estimate that tens of thousands of different colors have been used in manufacturing new vehicles since 1950.

You may think your vehicle is a generic shade of black or white, but you may be surprised to discover there are a number of shades of both black and white.

Most body shops do not use paint suited for touch up. Many automotive paint experts recommend customers try the Web to satisfy their needs.

There are several sites that offer touch-up paint for automobiles. An excellent site that many motorists use because it's so user friendly is paintscratch.com. To help the user identify the correct color of paint for their vehicle, the Web site displays color samples that show the user all the different colors used in the manufacture of each individual vehicle.

All you do is type in the year, make and model of your vehicle and the Web site brings up all the colors they made your specific vehicle in.
