

Web Sites: Windows To The World

(NAPSA)—Chances are, it's hard to imagine not owning a computer—even though it may not have been that long ago when you first bought one. Experts say people may soon look at the days before they owned a Web site in the same way.

Before getting your own site there are a few things to consider.

First, remember that effective Web sites need to be updated regularly, so hiring a designer means you have to pay them every time you want something changed.

Keep in mind that high-end software produces great results but can require a significant investment of time and money, while low-end software doesn't always offer the features you need to stay competitive.

One popular alternative is Namo WebEditor 2006 suite (available in stores and at www.namo.com). The software uses intuitive wizards to create Web sites with many features found in high priced software. Developed to simplify complex tasks, the results are easy to update, dynamic Web sites that offer competitive advantages.

Namo also makes Freemotion, a software to animate images and edit video for viewing on your Web site. Namo users of either product, receive three months of free Web hosting (www.namohosting.com) and one year of free domain name licensing.

Web sites are your personal window to a world of opportunity. Make sure yours is one you can be proud of—now and in the future.
